In the aftermath of the financial crisis, the ease with which this claim is made...

capitalism has shifted in a decisive manner only twice in the last hundred years. In both eras underlying sociological trends created pressures for reform that were harnessed in support of purposeful political action. In the 1940s, a generation of moderate welfare capitalism was spurred on by the legacy of Depression, the fallout of War, and the growing power of organised labour (both in the workplace and at the ballot box). In the 1980s, the foundations for the neo-liberal shift grew from declining domestic competitiveness, an increasingly open international economy, alongside major demographic and occupational trends which undercut both support and legitimacy from the Keynesian settlement.

In the aftermath of the financial crisis, it has almost become a cliché for people on the Left to argue that we need a 'new economy'. The ease with which this claim is made obscures the enormous task of actually achieving it. The fundamental character of British capitalism has shifted in a decisive manner in response to the pressures for reform that were harnessed through the mobilisation of substantial agendas and governing projects which economy are both difficult and disruptive to overcome, significant dislocation is also

In his speech to this year's Labour Party conference, Ed Miliband argued that there is a need for a more 'responsible capitalism' in its place. He pointed to the failures of neo-liberalism and the need to learn from Labour's recent past and constitute a new agenda to define his leadership (Miliband, 2010). He argued that the Labour Party on the Left what Mrs Thatcher delivered for the

This argument has divided opinion. Many on the right see the inherent deficiencies of capitalism and argue that it can never deliver a more 'responsible capitalism'. Some on the left sympathetic to the agenda wonder why the Labour Party majority of working people begins to see the need for Ed Miliband is right to argue for a more 'responsible capitalism' takes the case made by the Labour Party and argues that it is actually advancing the political change

Indeed, the contention developed here is that the Labour Party with the potential to win, govern and change the country. However, the economic convulsions of recent years have undoubtedly created new spaces for
